

Iran: The veil is lifting

Text and photos by Christoph Otto

Ever since the revolution, the western world has feared Iran. But now the clinch with the UN veto powers over Iran's nuclear power programme is over, successfully negotiated by president Rouhani in Vienna, who is considered a liberal. The great burden of thirty years of sanctions are now history. What will happen now? What kind of a life do Iranian women lead? How great is the desire to finally arrive in the modern world? We look at a country and society faced by many prejudices and preconceptions.
